1. Think back to a past peer learning experience you participated in and describe it below. Which part of the experience were effective at helping you learn? Was there any part of the experience that was ineffective?

2. Think about a "lecture style" activity that you've delivered in the past as a trainer. Can you redesign the content to work in a virtual, peer-learning setting? Describe how you would redesign the activity below.

Include any concerns that arise for you as you think through the redesign and how you might address them. For example, maybe you have concerns about peers not doing an adequate job teaching the content to one another. In this case, you will need to put in place guardrails to ensure learners are walking away with what you are intending. Asking learners to display their knowledge to you is an effective way to see where your learners are at in learning the material.

3. Ensure that "Send me an email receipt of my responses" is checked below before submitting your response.
